After the electoral fraud in November 201, protests erupted everywhere and Wilmer Adalberto Paredes Gámez was responsible for the security of the protests in San Juan Pueblo. He suffered violent repercussion for this and on December 16, 2018, he was brutally tortured by state security forces. Calls by national and international HRDs succeeded in getting him released from custody. But when MADJ asked for protection for him from the national protection mechanism, help was denied. Shorty afterwards, on January 1, 2017, Wilmer was assassinated.

"Today we want his name and example to be the first light that illuminates this 2019 and the challenges we have before us. What is clear is that our blinding reality must be faced in that way, with determination and strength. No comfort, no waiting or delay. That we must fight against this reality until we return it to a state in which, controlled, without power, without the ability to continue humiliating our people, so that dignity is the only way of life possible."

The unilateral cancellation by the government in Guatemala of the agreement with the CICIG is also discussed in Honduras.

The Secretary General of the UN, Antonio Guterres, denounced it but also reminded the Guatemalan government that they cannot cancel the agreement unilaterally and that CICIG will continue to work until the end of its mandate next September.

The signs from Guatemala are especially worrisome as JOH was the only one supporting his Guatemalan counterpart at the UN General Assembly last September when "Morales accused the CICIG of "judicial terrorism" and of damaging the country's sovereignty".

Even though Libre representatives have reiterated on many occasions the crucial importance of a two-round presidential elections, the National Party does not see this as a priority.

It seems like the, as with the National Dialogue, the National Party is actively trying to sabotage the electoral reforms and then blaming the political opposition for it.

Combining social movements and the political opposition, the Citizen Action against the Dictatorship (ACCD) held a press conference yesterday to call out to the Honduran people to join them in the streets demanding the end of the JOH regime. CESPAD criticizes the unilateral focus on the homicide rate by the JOH regime when it comes to security. "[Security Minister] Pacheco, who promised to reduce the homicide rate in 2019 to less than 35 per 100'000 inhabitants, stunned both locals and foreigners by making that assertion without the slightest contemplation of what citizen security really means in first world countries, where respect for human rights prevails. The official's thinking reduces security to violent deaths, avoiding facts such as extortion, kidnappings, (...). The corporate media validated the official data and presented it as the only truth, forgetting the rigor of ethical and professional journalism that must validate the data with other sources of information. Although in Honduras there is a Secrecy Law that prevents access to public information, the media may have resorted to context analysis or interview victims of violence, to counteract the statements of Julián Pacheco with the true sense of citizen security, which implies ensuring coexistence and peaceful development in a society, preventing crime."

"The sentence against the journalist David Romero Ellner clearly reflects what the IACtHR established in its preliminary observations of its visit to the country in August 2018: that in Honduras there is a "selective justice" that, on the one hand, acts in a delayed manner regarding human rights violations, but that, on the other hand, favors the interests of diverse actors linked to the public power."

Sociologist Eugenio Sosa published an analysis of the currently discussed electoral reforms. "In this brief analysis, the following questions are reflected and answered: What are the most important political-electoral reforms for Honduran democracy? What are the political-electoral reforms that have the possibility of being approved? And, according to their immediate interests, how do political parties act in relation to the political-electoral reforms?

In conclusion, the political-electoral horizon does not envisage deep democratic reforms that imply that political parties are willing to "go to work", and above all lose control of bodies such as the Supreme Electoral Tribunal (TSE) and the National Registry of Persons (RNP) and build necessary rules for the democratization of the country, without giving advantage to a particular party. The political-electoral reforms that are visualized will be limited, to the extent of the new party reconfiguration, but also to the extent of the old electoral political behavior, which does not disappear automatically due to the emergence of new political forces."

The New York Times reports on the new migrant caravan forming in Honduras and planned to take off in tomorrow. "The first challenge to the migrants may come from their own governments. The deeply unpopular presidents of Honduras and Guatemala, both tarnished by scandal, are eager to maintain the support of the Trump administration. Halting the caravan could help them do that."

Two additional mass killings took place this past weekend raising the death toll to 23 in six mass killings.

More state security forces are sent to "hot" places.

The director of UNAH's Violence Observatory, Migdania Ayestas, presents these murders as a direct challenge for the police.

Security Minister Julián Pacheco claims that they are related and that they have clear leads.

The third major migrant caravan took off yesterday from San Pedro Sula. El Pulso writes off some 1500 people traveling together.

They encountered the first obstacle at the Guatemalan border Agua Caliente, where by then 2500 Hondurans were stopped by both the Honduran and Guatemalan police. According to the journalist Andrés Molina, 1500 were already in Guatemala, 1000 still in Honduras at 10.30pm.

Initially, the security minister Julián Pacheco had said that they won't stop anyone migrating as it is a human right.

Later, they confirmed having held back at least 60 minors.

ContraCorriente accompanies the caravan with an OpEd entitled "The Exodus as a Form of Protest".

The caravan was also accompanied by a press release by the Norwegian Refugee Council (NRC).

For those still in doubt about the difficult situation in Honduras, the first days of 2019 served as an important reminder. In just two weeks, eight mass killings took place, letting doubt grow regarding the statistics presented by the JOH regime. The former police commissioner María Luis Borjas holds the JOH regime responsible for the violence as a response to the arrest of JOH's brother Tony Hernández. "I definitely think that security forces are behind these massacres, at this moment they are wiping the table clean, this always happens after the capture of a high cartel boss, as in this case, the capture of the brother of the president".

InSight Crime also has picked up the increase in mass killings. "Authorities in Honduras have touted a decline in homicides in recent years, but a series of massacres to start 2019 raises questions about the ongoing security situation in the Central American nation."

The police, meanwhile, continues to claim that there are less murderers taking place in Honduras.

Rodolfo Pastor Campos makes the link to migration writing about "eight massacres and a caravan".

The UN Special Rapporteur on the Situation of Human Rights Defenders published the World Report on the Situation of HRDs. The subsection on Honduras is one of the longest in the report. Another point is worth highlighting: "In the last five years almost half of the Special Rapporteur's communications have been sent to the Americas with Honduras receiving more than any other State in the region. Many of the communications concern the killing of defenders. Each time the Special Rapporteur has expressed concern at the dangerous environment in which human rights defenders work and has condemned the killings, attacks, harassment and defamation of defenders which take place in a climate of growing violence and insecurity."

Congress is expected to vote on the electoral reforms next week. Congress' Nationalist president Mauricio Oliva promises "the most profound [electoral reforms] in the history of Honduras". He also claims that they have a majority in Congress by over 100 votes (out of 128).

A second statement by Oliva raises doubt about that as he dismisses the importance of a two-round presidential election, a red line for the political opposition. Another key topic, the presidential reelection won't be discussed either.

Pinu congresswoman Doris Gutiérrez presented some proposals as well, among them the prolongation of the term by presidents, congresswo/men and mayors to five years. OFRANEH reports on their struggle to get access to a resolution by a Trujillo court on communitarian land possession. Honduras indigenous peoples have been protesting the Property Law since its elaboration and approval in 2004 for violating indigenous rights. The case looked at by the Trujillo court regards a decision based on this law about communitarian land in Guadalupe, Colón granted to a Canadian businessman. A local employee was accused of abuse of authority for granting him the land, but based again on the Property Law, she was acquitted. According to OFRANEH, this decision means the end of communitarian land in Honduras.

On July 27, 2018, the MP pressed charges against the police sub-commissioner Raúl Martínez Alvarado for abuse of authority and torture during the post-electoral repression against the journalists Rony Jonathan Martínez and Cesar Omar Silva as well as Libre congressman Jari Dixon. Now, six months later, the initial hearing took place. "C-Libre positively assesses the accusation, however, considers that in this case there are evidentiary elements to accuse other police and military officials who participated in the assaults on the aforementioned victims as in the general attack against the peaceful protest."

At the same time, the assassinations by public security forces during the same time rest in impunity and with a week of protests up to the anniversary of JOH's second inauguration starting this Sunday, more violent repression is feared. The Security Secretariat published a press release warning that they won't allow "violent protests".

Canadian human rights defender and coordinator of the Honduran Solidarity Network writes about the day one year ago when her now husband Edwin Espinal was detained. "Little did we both know that evening, Edwin would be quickly 'processed' by the Honduran judicial system and the Public Prosecutor's office that would within a day, send him to a maximum security prison where he still remains. Little did I know, I would spend the year fighting to get him out alongside the incredible Honduran social movement."

Giorgio Trucchi reports on the negative impacts of tourism in Honduras' Golfo de Fonseca region. "Honduran social activists in the Gulf of Fonseca question the Honduran government's discourse on the benefits of tourism development and denounce the brutality of the process of dispossession of the communities by these investments. (...) Also for Fabián Ávila [of the social movement ADEPZA], tourism could be something very important to improve the living conditions of the people. "We have always said: those of us who fight for the defense of the territory do not oppose development. We want development, we want work, we want tourists to arrive, enjoy the beauties of our island, these beautiful beaches, the Sea and the sun of southern Honduras. But it must be something that benefits everyone. We have lived here for decades and communities must be consulted and participate in these processes. We want a tourism that comes from within the communities. Tourism can no longer be built on dispossession and privatization. We are tired of this, "concluded Avila."

The former Attorney General Edmundo Orellana dedicates an OpEd to a "transcendental" decision by a judge in the Open Chest corruption case. The defense of the accused current and former congresswo/men wanted to judge to suspend the charges against them for three years based on the very disputed reforms to the budget bill, the so-called Impunity Pact. The judge denied this arguing that this change, according to him, is unconstitutional.

On Wednesday, the US Department of Justice informed about the criminal charges filed against Amilcar Alexander Ardón Soriano and Mario Jose Calix Hernandez (see yesterday). A link between Calix Hernández with Tony Hernández, and therefore at least indirectly with JOH, was directly highlighted in the press release, but not for Ardón Soriano. A 2013 article by CEPR does a great job at this. As the mayor of El Paraíso, Ardón Soriano was directly involved in the 2013 electoral fraud in favor of JOH.

El Heraldo reports that there is no arrest warrant out in Honduras against Ardón Soriano.

The MACCIH published their analysis of the proposed reforms to the organic law of the Supreme Audit Court (TSC). While they highlight some progress, they also criticize that "part of these reforms weaken the audit and control powers of the Court and the independence of the Public Ministry". Honduras commemorated the Day of the Honduran Woman yesterday.

In 1955 on January 25, Honduran women got the right to vote.

Women and feminist organization held a protest in Tegucigalpa.

And while Honduras commemorates its women, it still continues to murder almost daily. In the first 16 days of 2019, at least 13 women were murdered.

<https://joaquinmejiarivera.blogspot.com/2019/01/13-femicidios-en-16-dias.html>

In another day of protests, ARCAH Movement blocked the Honduras-Nicaragua border demanding the resignation of JOH as well as the liberation from their land of mining concessions.

<https://twitter.com/hondurassol/status/1088827883190145025>

Libre's approval of limited electoral reforms undermining the red line they themselves set (see further down), raised some criticism. But the JOH regime also uses it to try to undermine the protests. Presidential Secretary Ebal Díaz said yesterday that Libre had no reason to protest anymore as they came to an agreement with the National Party in Congress.

For the third day in a row, a Honduran politician warns of imminent threat to the MACCIH. Eduardo Martell, member of the Central Committee of the Liberal Party, denounces that the agreed upon electoral reforms will bring the end of the MACCIH. He claims that as part of the deals made to get through the, limited and widely criticized, electoral reforms is an agreement not to renew the contract with the MACCIH. Neither his, nor the two previous claims in this direction have been addressed by the MACCIH and it will be interesting to see if they will react in the coming days.

ContraCorriente interviewed the above-cited Eduardo Martell about the electoral reforms. He denounced the deals made between the National Party, Libre and one section of his own party which led to the reforms. According to him, what is needed is "a comprehensive reform that includes a second round [presidential election], a plebiscite for [presidential] re-election, a totally scientific and nonpartisan record, a reliable electoral body with the guarantees and self-control mechanisms that guarantee a process respecting the sovereign will."

Criticism comes also from social movements and human rights organizations. Radio Progreso summarized them as "a repartition of state bodies" between the political parties.

The political analyst Agustuo Aguilar warns that without the two-round presidential election the effect of the already limited reforms will be further diminished.

It is, therefore, especially disappointing that UN representative Igor Garafulic praised the reforms and belittles the fact that the two-round election has not been approved yet.

The OAS also welcomed the reforms.

JOH showed his approval of the reforms yesterday in Congress, which says a lot about its content. Congress' president, meanwhile, announced that the elements of the electoral reform for which no consensus are found will be part of a popular consultation. But this could also be a delay tactic, for example by including such questions in the next presidential election, i.e. holding further elections with the current system.

"In this article, drawing on case studies from Honduras and the United States, I argue that—despite Orwell's warning that the term has lost its meaning—anthropologists can still productively engage fascism as an analytical category. Today is the anniversary of the second, illegal inauguration of JOH. The Honduras Solidarity Network reports live on Facebook and Twitter about the events of the day, for which "at least 63 protests of different types (road blockades, gatherings, rallies, etc) in 14 departments" are planned in Honduras. Combined with heavy military and police presence and the memory of the two months after the illegal reelection in 2017, repression by state security forces must be feared.

Honduras Daily: JOH - Protests, Repression; Journalists; Electoral Reforms; and Escaping the Land of Fear

Bladimir López Sánchez, political analyst at CESPAD, looks back at the first year after the electoral coup manifested in the illegal second inauguration of JOH on January 27, 2018. "On January 27, 2018, the country was divided into two. On the one side, Juan Orlando Hernández (JOH), after an illegal process of presidential re-election and electoral fraud, declared himself president of the Republic and on the other side, the popular forces in the streets did not recognize JOH as their president and put in question his re-electionist and continuist project. In the end, what was in dispute was the continuity of the authoritarian, extractivist and militarist project of JOH and the democratization of society through a government with social and popular orientation." The Sánchez goes on to analysis what has happened since, e.g. the reconfiguration of Honduras' political forces or the profound crisis of legitimacy of the JOH regime.

The image of the two Honduras further separated by the electoral coup also appears in an analysis by COFADEH.

MADJ looks also back at the previous year and it looks also forward at the struggles to come. "After a year of self-imposed narco-dictatorship, MADJ shouts "FUERA JOH" with even greater power, but we reiterate that we want him out and imprisoned, for being one of the main leaders of a criminal and corrupt political-economic class which has assaulted all the powers and constitutional institutions of the State to take over the goods and resources that must be public and for the collective benefit."

About two weeks ago, the confirmation of a sentence against David Romero for alleged defamation spurred up a discussion in Honduras about freedom of expression and its limits in Honduras. One case mention was the one of the former police commissioner and now Libre congresswoman Maria Luisa Borjas. Her case has now made international headlines. "Days before Honduras' elections in 2017, a former high-ranking official in the national police, Maria Luisa Borjas, held a news conference at which she read from government investigative reports about three high-profile killings. Now, as an opposition lawmaker, she faces the possibility of a fine and, more significantly, the loss of her seat in Congress when she goes on trial Monday charged with defamation. Her alleged crime was essentially naming names — the suspected "intellectual authors" of a slaying contained in one of those reports — in a country where the powerful have long enjoyed impunity."

A week ago, US authorities informed about charges filed against two Hondurans for drug trafficking. Their cases were linked to JOH's brother Tony Hernández. According to Radio Globo, one of them, Mario José Cálix Hernández presented himself yesterday to the DEA office in San Pedro Sula. Apparently, he fears being murdered.

El Heraldo confirms this.

Another presumed drug trafficker linked to Tony Hernández, Nery Orlando López Sanabria, is currently held at the El Pozo prison. His lawyer denounces that his client receives death threats.

Tomas Andino Mencía takes apart some of the arguments presented by Libre to portray the electoral reforms so far agreed-upon as a success. He concludes: "The leadership of LIBRE has only two options: either stop playing along and really bet on making a unified fight against the dictator, or join his power block, being satisfied with the crumbs that are reserved for their good services."

Congress' president Mauricio Oliva told media outlets yesterday that a public consultation could take place in 2020 in which Hondurans could decide about the two-round presidential election and the possibility of members of the Armed Forces, Police and the church to vote.

After initially lauding the reforms, UN representative Igor Garafulic now finds some, slightly, more critical words.

As feared, the former police commissioner and Libre congresswoman Maria Luisa Borjas was found guilty for defamation (see also yesterday). She is the second important critic of the JOH regime and his allies found guilty of this in the first month of 2019. "Speaking to local reporters outside the courtroom, Borjas said that she planned to appeal the verdict in Honduras and if necessary to international legal bodies. Borjas had said prior to the verdict that she feared it could be used to try to oust her from the congress."

Borjas denounced the verdict as a "judicial contract killing" by a co-opted judicial system.

The previously mentioned case of Borjas is also important for the Berta Cáceres case. Borjas had mentioned banker Camilo Atala as one of the intellectual authors of the murder of Berta. He then sued her leading to the trial. His lawyer now interprets the sentence as a not guilty verdict of Atala, even though this was never investigated as part of the trial.

And not just lawmakers are affected by a punitive use of libel laws. Journalists are especially targeted, Carlos Martínez even for the second time in less than a year. "We have a sensitive political class that intends to dictate to us how to practice journalism and which we must ask for permission to practice our profession; they practically believe that they can go to court with any journalist who is put in front and especially if this communicator does not bend to their will."

The case of journalist Jairo López becomes more worrying by the day. Javier Suazo published a short analysis of the first year of the second illegal term by JOH. As previous observers, he highlights the need for a united political and social opposition. "Although it may seem like a difficult crusade, the integration of the work and struggle of opposition political parties and civil society groups and associations of as well as citizen participation is urgent. Otherwise, JOH will be much stronger on next January 27, 2020.

The criticism of the limited electoral reforms did not stop with yesterday's ratification of them by Congress. Sociologist Víctor Meza concludes: "The reform, having been postponed for so many years and so many times demanded by national and foreign actors, had awakened hopes in giving the electoral system the lost credibility and the necessary modernization. In the end, everything was a kind of grotesque farce, an unfinished initiative, an agreement to continue practicing the old culture of sectarian "partisanship" of institutions, always faithful to the harmful patrimonial vision of the State. The State as prey. Then, the lamentations will start."

Tomás Andino published a criticism of the reforms which some misunderstood as opposition to Libre being represented in the new National Electoral Council (CNE). He clarifies his position. "In the face of such a dictatorship, we are at another level of struggle and we can not continue with the practices of the past. You can not continue to see the presidential office and congressional seats as the goals of political activity. These would be in a real democracy, which does not exist here. Today in Honduras the real goals should be:

First, REMOVE JOH and, with him, the whole gang of officials, deputies and magistrates who are faithful to him.

Second, the installation of a PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT integrated by all the forces that truly participate in the struggle against the dictatorship and have a broad level of convocation.

And third, the call for an ORIGINAL CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY, to organize the country we need."
